

Imagine this, you're driving through the central plateau of New Zealand and you see a wild New Zealand Kaimanawa horse, then you see a hunter about to kill it, BANG!!! it's dead.

Hi im brooke and going to tell you why we should save the Kaimanawa horses by adopting one.

The first reason of why you should save a Kaimanawa horse is because they make great pets. If you want a horse, a Kaimanawa horse is the one I suggest. They make great show ponies because they are easy to train and willing to please their owner. They need a nice owner who will love them, feed them and take care of them and give them lots of hugs and kisses. If the owner takes care of them they will reward their owner.

Another point i'd like to make of why you should save the Kaimanawa horse is because you are saving them from being shot. The department of conservation who is also known as DOC has to keep the Kaimanawa horse population down to 300. They check the herds and quantities twice a year and decide on what they're going to do. If there are more than 300 and if they're not saved they shoot them! How mean is that? They didn't do anything wrong! So the more we save the less they shoot.

The third reason of why we should save the Kaimanawa horses they responded so well to all the different noises around them. The horses make it so much easier by being trustworthy of the humans. That is what makes them great. They respond very well and although there are some scuffles going on in the yards, they are overall very calm.
